The It's Wise to Immunize program is devoted to increasing immunization rates and the use of primary care providers. The program educates the public about the importance of immunizations, provides vaccinations and links families to primary care providers.

Since the partnership began, the immunization compliance rate for children enrolled in DC public and public charter schools has improved greatly and is higher than the national average.

This year, CHA will use a variety of incentives to encourage immunizations and completion of the well-child doctor's visit, including supplying students with new backpacks and school supplies after completion of their scheduled physical and immunization appointment at one of several community-based health centers or mobile units working in partnership with the Department of Health.

C.2 BACKGROUND

The It's Wise to Immunize program is devoted to increasing immunization rates and the use of primary care providers. The program educates the public about the importance of immunizations, provides vaccinations and links families to primary care providers.

It's Wise to Immunize is a partnership including the District of Columbia Department of Health (DOH) Immunization Program, District of Columbia Public Schools (DCPS), Children's National Medical Center Government and External Affairs Division, and Children's School Services School Health Program.

Through this partnership, thousands of school-aged children have been vaccinated during the last five years to prepare them for a healthy school year. Since the partnership began, the immunization compliance rate for children enrolled in DC public and public charter schools has improved greatly and is higher than the national average.

In 2007, the District attained the highest immunization rates in the country at 97.94%. However, since that time the rates have dipped to 86% and continue to trend downward. A 100% immunization rate is the city's target and outreach is necessary to get a message to students and their parents that they should not only comply with legally mandated immunization requirements, but by not immunizing they are putting themselves and their children at serious health risks.

This year, the Department of Health, Community Health Administration (CHA) will take the charge in a campaign to encourage parents to make their children's immunization appointments in timely manner. CHA will use a variety of incentives to encourage immunizations and completion of the well-child doctor's visit, including supplying students with new backpacks and school supplies after completion of their scheduled physical and immunization appointment at one of several community-based health centers or mobile units working in partnership with the Department of Health.
